Choose a Website and Find the Data Privacy Policy
Choose an app, website, or other online service you are familiar with to research their privacy policy. The easiest way to find a data policy, if it exists, is to search for the company name followed by the terms “data policy” or “privacy policy.”

Your website: Spotify

What Is Their Data Policy?
Respond to the questions below. Even if you can’t find information, you should record where you looked and the fact that you can’t find it. If there isn’t a policy or it’s hard to find, that can be just as interesting as seeing the policy itself.

What kinds of data are being collected? How many different kinds of data?
When using the application Spotify the data that is being collected is your email address, your full name and more. The amount of different kinds of data is several such as your photos, your library and many more.

What service or feature is enabled by the data they are collecting? Why are they collecting it in the first place?
The service or feature that is enabled by the data they are collecting is recommended music or artists you may also like or be interested in. A feature Spotify has is recommends other apps you may also like to use.

Who else is given access to that data? How are they using it?
People that are given access to that data would be owners of the app or anyone else that gets access to your account wither by your email or resting your password.

Can you get access to your own data? Can you modify what is collected or used, or delete your data if you wish?
I would be able to access my own data because I have the username, the password and the email address to login the account.

Bottom Line: on a scale of 1-4, rate how comfortable you are with this company’s data policy? Give your rating (no going halfway - no 2.5 or 1.5 - make a choice!) and then justify your choice.

1 very uncomfortable
2 uncomfortable (but maybe fixable)
3 comfortable (maybe minor concerns)
4 very comfortable

I do feel comfortable with Spotify’s data policy because after reading their terms I found it to be fair and to me and anyone who plans to use this application.
